Bryant Furlow New Mexico in Depth is publishing a series this week on youth suicide prevention efforts in the state's tribal communities, reported by Laura Paskus and me, with photography by Mark Holm and Adria Malcolm. Prevention efforts at tribes across the state are working to change traditions of silence around suicide, and to provide kids places like the Thoreau Community Center, where they can talk, plan dances and skateboard competitions, and just play and be kids. It's making a difference.

Confronting a long tradition of silence

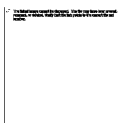

This taboo of speaking about death is common among New Mexico's tribal communities. Some people in and around Thoreau are pushing to change that after as many as 15 young people died by suicide in 2010.
